The Waggle Dance
Read: John 4:27-36

Come, see a Man who told me all things that I ever did. —John 4:29

How do bees lead one another to nectar? Scientists say it's all about the "waggle" dance. The theory was regarded with skepticism when it was first proposed by Nobel Prize-winning zoologist Karl von Frisch in the 1960s. But now, researchers in the United Kingdom have used tiny radar responders attached to worker bees to support von Frisch's theory. They've confirmed that the bee orients its body toward the food source and uses the intensity of its waggle dance to signal the distance to other bees.

The woman who met Jesus at Jacob's well also found a way to lead the rest of her community to what she had found—living water (John 4:10). They were drawn to discover why this woman with five ex-husbands and a current live-in was saying, "Come, see a Man who told me all things that I ever did" (v.29).

As the crowd was on its way, the One who on other occasions had called Himself "the bread of life" (6:48) was telling His disciples that His food was found in doing the will of God (4:32,34). Jesus is living water and food for our soul. Joining Him to do the will of God and finish the work He has given us to do is the ultimate source of nourishment. By Mart De Haan

Keep your witness bright and clear,
So the world may see and hear

God's salvation far and near,

That others too may know Him. —Hess

When you have found food for your soul lead others to the Source.

When the Release Part of "Catch & Release" Fishing is a Little More Challenging

I have to give credit where credit is due. This week's piece originated from a conversation I had with a young woman who cut my hair back in May. She revealed she had learned to fish from her father when she was younger. Now, after a few year hiatus, she was getting back into fishing and was currently in the process of teaching her boyfriend how to fish. She commented she never had any issues with putting her own bait on the hook, casting, or actually hooking fish when they bite. Her challenge at times was getting the fish off the hook, especially when they are deeply hooked. Well, that's an ongoing issue most fishermen and women have to occasionally deal with and a topic that warrants further consideration.

Getting a fish off the hook starts before your line even goes in the water. It begins with your selection of terminal tackle, i.e.: what's going to be tied on the end of your line? Are you going to be fishing with a lure, a fly, or bait? Will you be employing a J-hook, circle hook, treble hook, or possibly going with a barbless hook to meet restrictions on certain waters? Based on experience, bait (whether it may be worms, night-crawlers, minnows, crickets, corn, prepared bait, etc.) tends to be swallowed deeply more often by fish, especially on J-hooks (which are the most frequently employed type), than an artificial lure or fly.

When you are fishing, you have to anticipate you are going to catch fish. That means you need to mentally and physically prepare for bringing a fish in on your line. Think about it in advance. Whether you are on the bank, wading, or in a boat, how are you going to land the fish? Do you have a net? Is the net within reach, especially if you are fishing alone? Do you plan on simply lifting the fish out of the water or grabbing it by its lip? What if it's an unanticipated sizeable fish, will lifting it out of the water, up the bank or into the boat, stress your line and knots to the point of breakage? If you are going to catch and keep is one thing, but if you plan on catching & releasing, it may not be in the fish's best interests to simply drag it up the bank, onto the beach, or across the rocks. Most anglers can tell horror stories about nice fish lost at the boat or bank, when there's not much line out between the rod and the fish, and the margin of error gets significantly greater. Remember, if you are using a net, try to have an appropriately sized one for the fish you are targeting (I don't bring my trout net when I'm after flathead catfish) and ALWAYS net a fish headfirst. I can't tell you how many times I've seen individuals, trying to be helpful, incorrectly attempt to net a fish tail-first and cause another angler's nice fish to get off at the last moment.

The skin of most fish is composed of scales (catfish are an exception), but all fish have a mucus outer layer of glycoproteins called mucins on their scales or skin to protect against microbes and mechanical wear. It is highly recommended you always wet your hands before handling a fish to avoid harming this protective mucus. When handling a fish, be aware the dorsal (back) fins can have sharp spines, so a proper grip is necessary to fold down the spines and keep them held down. Additionally, some species of the catfish family have sharp pectoral fins (behind the gills) that can injure your hands, if you are not careful. Fortunately, once you have a good grip of a fish either by the body or the lip, the bait hook, lure, or fly can often either be removed from the jaw or lip by hand or with a pair of forceps or needle-nose pliers before the fish is either put on the stringer, secured in the livewell, or released back into the water.

While we breathe and obtain oxygen from the air, remember fish breathe with their gills to obtain oxygen from the water. Do not keep a fish you plan to release out of the water any longer than necessary. That includes the cumulative time of handling it and taking photos. Maybe a few moments back in the water will be required while the fish is in your possession. Always handle fish gently to avoid damage to their gills or internal organs. A little bleeding might be OK, but a lot of blood often means the fish won't make it after being released. A deeply hooked fish requires careful work with a pair of forceps or needle-nose pliers, a plastic hook disgorging, one of the newer hook disgorgers that look like stainless surgical tools, or a simple pencil diameter stick about a foot long. With a firm grip of the fish, the goal is to use your tool to grasp or push on the bottom curved bend of the hook to back the hook's point & barb out a little bit in order to release its attachment in the fish. If it's deep in the stomach, this may not be possible without severely injuring the fish. Then comes the difficult decision on whether to release the fish with the hook still in it. Research studies have been inconclusive on whether fish can survive this way. Be a responsible angler and consider these facts when fishing! God Bless, Be Safe, and Great Outdoors! ©WBB 2024

Paws Corner by Sam Mazzotta

DEAR PAW'S CORNER: I left my dog Shep in the care of a pet sitter for a week while I was away on business. The sitter texted me that Shep cut his paw during a walk in the nearby woods, and they took him to my veterinarian for care. Shep is doing fine now. I have pet insurance, but I don't think it's my responsibility to pay for this. The injury occurred while the sitter was walking him. The sitter says that injury and illness are my responsibility to cover. Who should pay?
- Bill in Chicago

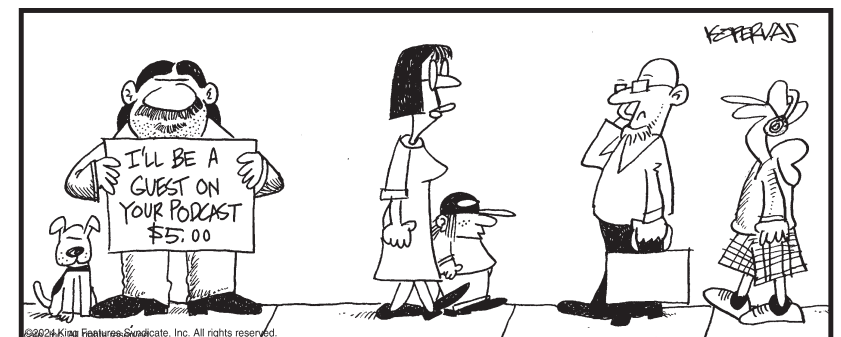

DEAR BILL: Did the sitter give any details of how Shep was injured? The circumstances are important. For example, if Shep was on-leash and stepped on an unexpected piece of debris in the path, that's different than if Shep was let off-leash and was running free in the woods. But, if you normally let him off-leash in the woods and instructed the sitter that it was OK to do that, then that's another consideration.

Talk more with the sitter to get more details. In the meantime, pay the vet and submit the reimbursement claim to the pet insurance company. Professional sitters routinely include a statement in their contract with clients that any illness or injury is the responsibility of the client. This protects them from financial loss if something does happen. However, if they are accused of deliberately neglecting or abusing a pet in their care, that statement won't protect them.

On this note, I'll add that sitters should purchase liability insurance that specifically covers them and their business in case a claim is made against them - or worse, if they're injured while caring for someone else's pet.
